

The Manager's Field Kit

Useful things for the weeks when the number, the team, or both are giving you trouble.

I've taken over teams that were doing great, teams that were struggling, and a few that were already on fire when I got there. Some I fixed. A couple I made worse before I made them better.

This isn't a management methodology, and there's no certification at the end. It's the stuff that kept being useful: figuring out whether the problem is the rep or the patch, getting an honest forecast, knowing whether there's really enough pipeline, helping a rep who's struggling, defending your people in review season, and keeping your own boss out of surprise mode.

Don't read it front to back. Find the problem you have this week and start there. Each chapter ends with the worksheet that goes with it.

Having a bad week? Start here.

Rep problem	Chapter 1 or 6	Boss problem	Chapter 5
Forecast problem	Chapter 3	Review season	Chapter 7
Pipeline problem	Chapter 4	High performers	Chapter 10

1. You inherited a team. Don't grade everybody yet.

My first mistake as a new manager was deciding pretty quickly who was good and who wasn't. I was wrong. Now I look at the patch before the person.

Before I decide a rep has a performance problem, I want to know whether the territory is any good, what's installed already, whether the quota is remotely reasonable, what the last rep did there, what the comp plan rewards, and whether there are enough customers who can actually buy what we sell.

If three good people have failed in the same patch, I probably don't have three bad salespeople. I have a bad patch.

Then I look at the rep. Not the CRM first. The rep. Do customers want to spend time with them? Have they created anything that wouldn't exist without them? Can they sell when they're actually in the room? Are they still trying?

One of the most useful things I ever did with a new team was sit with each rep and go through five real deals. You learn a lot from how somebody talks about a customer. And every once in a while, the rep who drives you nuts internally turns out to be the one customers keep calling back. That matters.

My first month. Week 1: meet everybody, ask what they'd change. Week 2: size the patches. Week 3: sit in deals and customer calls. Week 4: tell your boss what you found. Patches first, people second.

Worksheet: Rep diagnostic

Rep _____ Date _____ Online: quotabird.com/rep

IN THIS ORDER	YES / SORT OF / NO	NOTES
Patch: could a good rep make this number here?
Customers: do they want time with this rep?
Pipeline: is there pipeline only this rep created?
Craft: can they sell in the room?
Will: are they still trying to win?

Patch is no: fix the situation. Craft is no: coach. Will is no: manage. If both are no in a fair patch, read chapter 6.

2. Keep the 1:1 and the forecast call separate

These aren't the same meeting. A 1:1 is about the person. A forecast call is about the number. Whenever I mixed them together, both got worse.

My 1:1 was usually thirty minutes, and the rep went first. What are they working on? What's getting in their way? What am I doing that's getting in their way? Then we look at one real deal properly.

I finish with one thing I saw them do well, one thing I'd try differently, and anything I said I'd do. Then I write my commitment down, and I do it. That last part built more trust than any management technique I ever learned.

Once a month I'd ask, "If you were running this team, what would you change?" You'll hear things nobody says in the staff meeting.

If people only bring you good news, you don't have a good team. You have a good-news reporting system. I want the rep who says "this deal is slipping" on Monday, not the one who keeps it green until Friday because they're afraid of the meeting.

Worksheet: One-on-one

Rep _____ Date _____

Their list: what's in their way, including me

One deal: customer, money, power, path, now

One thing they did well, one thing to try

What I said I'd do, and by when

3. The forecast call isn't story time

To me, commit means the customer could explain how the money gets from them to us, and roughly when. Anything short of that's some flavor of hope. Most shaky deals eventually break in one of five places:

WHERE IT BREAKS	WHAT I'M REALLY ASKING
Customer	Do they actually want to solve this?
Money	Is there real money attached to it?
Power	Are we connected to somebody who can make it happen?
Path	Do we know how they actually buy?
Now	Why does anything happen this period?

The best forecast question I know is still "Who told you that?" Not "what do you think," not "how confident are you." Who told you, and when? A named customer and a date beats enthusiasm every time. I've forecast plenty of enthusiasm. It has a terrible close rate.

When a rep and I disagree, I don't need to win the argument. I ask which of the five they'd defend to my boss, and we forecast that. Nobody has to lose face. The forecast just gets better.

One question I ask a lot: what changed? Deals move because something changed with the customer, not because another week passed in the CRM.

Worksheet: Deal inspection

Deal _____ Rep _____ Online: quotabird.com/deal

QUESTION	YES / SORT OF / NO	WHO SAID SO, AND WHEN
Customer: have they said they want to solve this?
Money: does it have a name and a fiscal year?
Power: have we met who can make it happen?
Path: do we know the vehicle and the approvals?
Now: what makes it happen this period?

I only call it commit with five answers I'd defend to my boss.

4. Pipeline has two jobs

Managers usually ask whether there's enough pipeline. I'd ask one more question: is it sturdy enough to survive a bad week? Those are different questions.

Enough. The 3X rule everybody repeats assumes roughly a 33% win rate. The math is simple: coverage needed is one divided by your win rate. Use your own team's qualified win rate, not somebody else's benchmark.

WIN RATE	COVERAGE NEEDED
15%	6.7X
20%	5.0X
25%	4.0X
33%	3.0X
40%	2.5X

Sturdy. A team can have 4X coverage and still be in trouble. So I also ask what happens if our biggest deal slips, whether the commit deals are actually moving, whether each one has a next step the customer owns, how much is back-loaded into the last month, and whether we're creating new pipeline or just aging the old stuff.

One habit I like: run the forecast once without your biggest deal. That's the plan I'd want to manage.

REP	NUMBER	QUALIFIED PIPELINE	WIN RATE	COVERAGE NEEDED (1 ÷ WIN RATE)	COVERAGE NOW	BIGGEST DEAL

If one deal is carrying a big chunk of the number, know exactly what happens if it moves.

5. Your boss mostly wants fewer surprises

I spent too much time early in management trying to give my boss more information. Usually they didn't need more information. They needed fewer surprises.

My update fits on one page: the number (commit, best case, gap), what changed and why, what worries me, what I'm doing about it, and one ask with a date. Or "nothing this week." And I lead with the bad news. "Heads up before this shows up in the CRM" beats letting your boss discover it.

I learned another one the expensive way. When somebody above me handed me a number I couldn't see, I used to say, "We'll find a way." Sometimes we did. Sometimes I spent the rest of the year explaining that sentence. Now I'd say, "Here's what I can commit to with what we have. Here's what would have to be true to get to your number." Then I show the math.

Worksheet: The five-minute boss update

Week of _____

Commit
Best case
Gap

What changed, and why

Biggest risk

What I'm doing about it

What I need from you, and by when

6. A struggling rep is a diagnosis before it's a verdict

Four very different problems can produce the same ugly dashboard.

PROBLEM	WHAT IT LOOKS LIKE	WHAT I DO
Bad situation	Good rep. Bad territory, quota, accounts or plan.	Fix the situation.
Skill	They're working, customers engage, deals just aren't converting.	Coach. Sit in the room.
Effort	They know how to sell. They're just not doing enough of it.	Set expectations clearly, in writing, with dates.
Wrong fit	Fair patch, enough support, and neither the skill nor the effort is there.	Now it's a performance conversation, not a coaching conversation.

Before I call it a performance problem, I make sure the rep knows what good looks like. Not eventually. Next Tuesday. I want to rule out the first three before I convince myself it's the fourth. I once spent months coaching somebody whose territory couldn't have produced the number for almost anyone. I'd like those months back. So would the rep.

7. Review season: bring receipts

The calibration room didn't see your rep's whole year. It saw whatever case you brought into the room. That took me too long to appreciate.

I keep a running note during the year: date, what happened, result. Nothing elaborate. Then review season isn't an archaeological dig through email and Slack.

For each rep I want three meaningful results (with numbers where numbers make sense), what happened because this person was there, why the work was at their level, specific examples behind any behavior I'm going to claim, and the harder thing I'd trust them with next.

Then I do one uncomfortable thing: I say the weakest part of my case first. It saves the room the trouble of finding it, and it makes everything else I say more credible.

I also check myself. Am I overweighting the last sixty days? Would I see this person differently if I didn't personally like working with them? Take away their biggest win: does my view hold? Take away their worst month: same question.

Worksheet: Talent review prep

Rep _____ Level _____ Online: quotabird.com/talent-review

Three results, with numbers where they make sense

What happened because this person was there

Why the work was at their level

Examples behind each behavior I'll claim

The harder thing I'd trust them with next

The weakest part of this case, said first

8. Things I learned the expensive way

- Managing the dashboard. The CRM got cleaner. The pipeline didn't get bigger.
- Saving the deal myself. Worked great once. Then the rep learned to wait for me.
- Managing the average. Two reps at 6X and two at 1X isn't a healthy team at 3.5X.

- Forecasting confidence. Some people sound certain about everything. That's a personality trait, not deal evidence.
- Waiting to deliver bad news. I wanted the fix before I told my boss. They'd have preferred the news Monday and the fix Friday.
- Giving everyone the same 1:1. My best seller and my newest seller needed completely different things from those thirty minutes.
- Discounting the wrong problem. I approved a discount when the real issue was access to power. We solved a price problem the customer didn't have.
- Talking too much on customer calls. I thought I was helping the rep. Mostly I was teaching the customer to look at me instead of them.
- Being the answer machine. Eventually everybody brought me problems and nobody brought me decisions.

9. A few lines worth stealing

WHEN	WHAT I SAY
A shaky deal	"Who told you that, and when?"
Moving something out of commit	"Which part would you defend to my boss?"
A rep is missing	"Forget the number for a minute. What's getting in your way?"
The target from above doesn't match reality	"Here's what I can commit to with what I have. Here's what has to change to get to that."
Bad news	"Heads up before this lands in the CRM."
A discount request	"What are we getting for it?"
A hard performance conversation	"Here's what good looks like thirty days from now."
You don't know	"I don't know. I'll find out by Thursday." Then find out by Thursday.

10. Managing high performers

The easiest way to lose a great seller is to manage them like everybody else. I've done it.

Mostly, I leave them alone. When customers call them back, they build their own pipeline and they tell me bad news before I find it, the system is working. My job is a fair patch, clearing what slows them down, helping when they ask, and keeping the rest of the company from improving them to death.

The other half isn't punishing them for being good. The reward for making the number shouldn't be a bigger number, three accounts nobody else could handle, and coaching the new hires on their own time.

Once a quarter I ask three things. What would make this job better? What do you want to be doing in two years? What am I asking of you that isn't worth your time? Then I act on at least one answer. Great sellers rarely leave over money alone. They leave when nobody noticed they were bored.

Sometimes another set of eyes helps

If one of these pages saves you one bad meeting, it did its job.
